

Nera Rosa, Former Popular Actress, Dead In New York

Theatrical days of ten years ago Thursday were recalled with the information from New York that Nera Rosa, actress, was dead. Many of the older players, those who attended the Grand Opera house, the present Orpheum, during the reign of Hopkins stock company, readily remembered this popular heavy woman.

Nera Rosa died in New York at Bellevue hospital, after a lengthy illness, and was buried July 26. Miss Rosa was 30 years of age and a widow. For the past two years she had lived in the metropolis, moving from Memphis in the early part of 1918.

As "heavy woman" for the Hopkins company, over a lengthy period, which closed about ten years ago, Miss Rosa was extremely popular. At Freeman was heavy man with Miss Rosa in the company, and there were many number of leading men and women. Her last local appearance was with the Emma Bunting stock company at the New Lyric theater, about four or five seasons back. Probably Miss Rosa's most notable engagement here and there, best remembered was in "The Two Orphans," played at the old Grand.

Before Miss Rosa came to Memphis she played in support of numerous stars, including Joseph Jefferson, Lillian Russell and Della Fox. Her Marion. Her husband has been dead many years.

THE POTATO FAMINE

In 1846 a blight almost totally destroyed the potato crop in Ireland.

The result was a famine from which, with the accompanying pestilence, 600,000 people perished within a year.

Analysis shows that the potato is very close to wheat in actual food value.

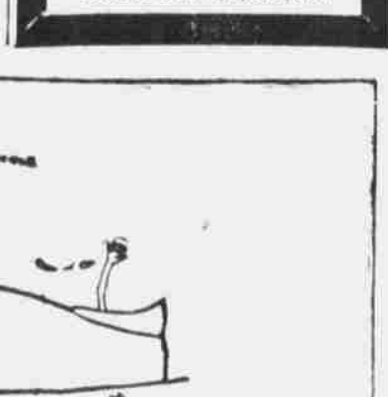

And, as served at CHILDS, it is one of the pleasures of a well balanced meal.
